Omega Institute for Holistic Studies, a pioneer in personal growth and social change, reopens its Rhinebeck, New York campus this week for six months of in-person workshops, conferences, retreats, and professional training, running now through October. Long recognized as one of the world’s top destinations for lifelong learning, Omega is taking steps to bring more of what they offer in the Hudson Valley directly to people’s homes, through online learning and new membership opportunities that can be accessed year-round.

“Having recently completed work on Omega’s 5-year Strategic Plan, we are energized and committed to enriching learning experiences and scaling up our engagement as a global force for change. At the heart of that commitment is membership,” said Robert “Skip” Backus, chief executive officer at Omega. “Omega will continue to offer more than 380 programs a year featuring outstanding teachers on our Rhinebeck campus, while adding exciting online learning opportunities that can be experienced from anywhere,” said Backus.

As a mission-driven nonprofit organization, Omega provides hope and healing to individuals and society. From protecting the environment to supporting veterans, women leaders, and other nonprofit organizations, to bringing yoga, mindfulness, and other wellness practices to an ever-widening community of people, Omega’s integrated approach to social, cultural, and environmental challenges brings a fresh perspective to some of today’s most pressing issues.

Omega believes that a holistic education should be available to everyone. To increase access and help counter financial barriers, Omega offers a robust scholarship program and tiered pricing options. Additionally, Omega’s community engagement efforts include a unique nonprofit retreat grant program that offers space to aligned change leaders so they can build organizational action plans, and rest and rejuvenate.

The newly launched Omega Membership program helps Omega sustain its capacity to deliver its nonprofit mission and expand its global impact. Member gifts help support Omega’s scholarship fund, fuel community outreach, and fortify its support to nonprofit peers. Membership benefits include access to articles, videos, and online talks, as well as one free online course each year, tuition discounts and savings on the Rhinebeck campus, and more. Membership benefits begin at $10 per month or $120 per year.
